Akrotiri, Wall-Painting “Spring Fresco”, 15th c.B.C

One of the most important centers of the Aegean in the prehistoric period. During the early Bronze Age (3rd Millennium B.C.) there was a settlement in Akrotiri. Later on (20th -17th century B.C.), the settlement was expanded and became one of the most significant centers and ports of the Aegean .

Its large extent, its perfect urban organization ,its sewage network, the artistic multi-floored buildings with some magnificent mural decorations and the rich furnishing , witness its great development.

The variety of imported products found within those buildings show the extension of the foreign relations of Akrotiri. They kept strong relations with Minoan Crete, but they had communication with continental Greece, Dodecanese ,Cyprus, Syria and Egypt.

Life in the city came to an abrupt end during the last quarter of the 17th century , when its residents decided to abandon it due to heavy earthquakes. The eruption of the volcano followed. The volcanic elements that covered the city and the whole island protected the buildings and their contents, until today, just like in Pompey.

Elements about the settlements in Akrotiri came into light during the second half of 19th century A.C. Systematic excavations began there in 1967 by Professor Spyridon Marinatos under the aegis of the Archaeological Company based in Athens. Marinatos decided to excavate in Akrotiri, hoping to verify an old theory of his, published in the 30s, that the eruption of the Thira volcano caused the destruction of the Minoan civilization. After Marinatos death, in 1974, the excavation continued under the observance of Professor Christos Doumas. No interventions were made on the revealing monuments, except in cases where fixing was needed.

The Spring Fresco was found on D2 group of the Akrotiri settlement and it is dated back to 1550 B.C.(a while before the eruption). Today it is exhibited in the Archaeological Museum of Athens. Group D it is constituted by four buildings .A room in the Eastern building was decorated with the Spring Fresco .The artist attributed with great sensitivity a rocky landscape with blooming red flowers, with swallows flying within .

This Fresco covered three walls of a ground floor room and reaches the flooring. We observe a line of volcanic rocks in three colors, yellow, red and blue(or black), that give us an idea of what the whole island looked like. The upper part of the wall is white and is litted up with red flowers (liliun cchalcedonicum) with yellow stalks sprouting in three. The flowers seem to move as wind blows. On the north wall two birds with held open the arcs of their wings seem to be making out. On the western wall the birds still seem to be making out, while a third one is coming towards them. On the southern wall the birds with their wings lowered and their head down are moving in opposite directions one another. Their attitude shows the sorrow of breaking up. The Fresco is a hymn to the coming of Spring and comes by a room, that is believed was built for worshiping reasons. The birds remind the corresponding ones in the Cycladic angiography, while the portrayal of the flowers brings to mind the vessels of Phytical rhythm from Crete. But here the birds are not static like they were in the Minoan Crete art. They are described with thin and thick lines .The flowers look like those of the Ancient Triad in Crete and with those found in the house of murals, in Knosos. Moreover such flowers decorated the walls of the mansion in Amnisos

Welcome Address

On behalf of my co-president Professor Furio Pacini it is my pleasure to invite you to the International Scientific Meeting Thyroid Cancer and Environment to be held in Santorini 8-10 June 2007 under the patronage of the European Thyroid Association (ETA) and the Hellenic Ministry of Health and Solidarity.

The island of Santorini combines together with its unique beauty the particularity of the volcanic soil that may influence thyroid function and prevalence of disease. There is evidence from various parts of the world associating the volcanic substrate with increased incidence of thyroid nodules and cancer.

The International Scientific Meeting in Santorini, dedicated exclusively to thyroid cancer, promises to be of utmost significance in delineating new concept in diagnosis and treatment as well as in evaluation of environmental impact.

The program is outstanding thanks to the invaluable contribution of eminent speakers and chairs from Europe and the United States.

We cordially invite you all to attend this exceptional event and we look forward to welcoming you in June on the lovely island of Santorini.
